honor the dinners were given would attend as Principal or as President of the Trustees. To recall Dr. Perry's services to the school for thirty-two years and Mr. Lamont's very tangible devotion for longer than his twenty-nine years as Trustee conveys more of the spirit of the occasions than a report of what was said there could do.

Somehow, among all the excellent talks, one passage in what John Finley said about Dr. Perry lingers in the mind, and it is repeated here almost as much for the general truth of it as for the personal application. "His traits of character, judgment, and human goodness," Finley said, "find their crown and halo in his humor. Humor, as opposed to wit or satire, is a trait of the saint because it is a kindly recognition of his own and others' frailties. But more than that, it reflects a certain tact of soul and spiritual modesty. People can be oppressed by having good deeds done when the act of goodness implies condescension. The truly good man, therefore, instinctively clothes his goodness in humor, so that people will not immediately recognize that goodness is being shown them. They go away thinking how delightful and amusing he was, and only slowly perceive the kindness that was being done. Yet the act of kindness was in Dr. Perry's mind from the first, and the humor was only its surrounding brightness."

A New Song for Exeter

For several years, Dr. Perry has often said that he wished someone would write an Exeter song to the tune of "Men of Harlech," an old favorite of his. The stirring notes of the old Welsh song of battle seemed well suited to this use; and this autumn Mr. Lucien Price, an editor of the Boston Globe and an old friend of Dr. Perry's and of the Academy's, wrote the words below. On the morning of the football game with Andover, Mr. Alfred Finch, the present director of music, led the school on singing the new song in chapel. As Mr. Finch explained, the last two stanzas are entirely occasional and are not to be considered a permanent part of the song. A musician and a distinguished musical critic, Mr. Price is sufficiently at home in the two fields of music and of words to know how the two should go together. This song, which sings extremely well, is a welcome addition to the Exeter anthology.

Exeter Ode

In New Hampshire's granite ledges
Old John Phillips drove his wedges,
Straight the lines and true the edges
Built by plumb and rule;
Never one for fuss or feather,
Built to stand all wind and weather,
Here we stand and stand together,
Exeter the school.

A spirit's in the air here
Of greatness that we share here,
Of noble men who boys have been
Before us as we are here;
Be our days your crown of praise
Your strength be in our brain and sinew,
Exeter, we glory in you,
Wisdom's shining jewel.

When the world we go to face it
Exeter shall make us grace it;
In our labor you shall trace it,
Sowing that was yours.
Here is laid the firm foundation
Of a stalwart generation
Vowed to build a nobler nation,
Grandeur that endures.

Storms that beat around us
Never need confound us;
Far sterner days and harder ways
Right steadfast shall have found us
Boy and man throughout life's span
This heritage we guard and treasure;
Length of days in boundless measure,
Exeter, be yours.

*Fortune of her gifts was chary,
Then she sent us Lewis Perry.
Are we grateful? Very, Very,
More than thirty years.
Manfully he fended for us,
Loyal is the love he bore us;
Give him now in rousing chorus,
Give him rousing cheers.*

*Mansions built more stately
Crown of living greatly,
His the share through peace and war
That plowed our furrow straightly;
His the back through storm and wrack
That steered our vessel safe and truly.
Give her captain honor duly
As his harbor nears.*
